Those who did not hear the readings by Miss Sarah Cowell, of New York, at the opera-house last evening missed a most enjoyable treat. The audience, which was a fair sized one, were highly pleased with Miss Cowell's selections, and the effective and able manner in which they were rendered. Her articulation of varied expression. The Bellevue Sanitarium society, for the benefit of which the entertainment was given, will realize quite a neat sum from the proceeds

Yesterday morning the police arrested a small boy on a charge of forgery. He was arrested to cash a check for $10, dated by Holmes & Co at the El Paso county bank but payment was refused on account of the glaring inaccuracy of the signature When he was accused of the offence the boy stated that he had found the check, but the police are positive that he had forged the signature, as he was at one time in the employ of the firm. Owing to the boy's age he was released from custody after receiving a sound admonition against repeating the offense

The many friends of Mr. George B. Ford will be sorry to learn that he has resigned his position with Mr. Duncan Bell and will embark in the drug business at Aspen. Mr. and Mrs. Ford will leave for that place to-morrow evening and will carry with them the best wishes of their numerous friends in Colorado Springs. Owing to his departure Mr. Ford has disposed of his interest in the baseball league base ball club to Mr. A B Brichin, who will hereafter act as manager The new manager thoroughly understands his business, and the ball-loving public of this city will have an opportunity to witness a number of interesting and exciting games during the coming two months.

Yesterday afternoon about 4 o'clock a cave in occurred in the sewer trench in the alley near Bennett Bros' store One of the engineering corps at work on the sewers was caught by the dirt and buried up to his shoulders His situation was rendered dangerous by the bursting of a water pipe near where he had been caught, the water from which backed the dirt tightly around him and threatened to suffocate him. A force of men were put to work to extricate him, and after considerable hard work, during which a second cave in was narrowly prevented, he was released from his uncomfortable position. Beyond a shaking up he was uninjured.

The base ball game this afternoon between the high school club of Denver and the Colorado Springs club will be a very interesting contest Bates will pitch for the visitors and will be well supported while the bat by Huntington Among the visiting club are Willoughby and Carlin who have appeared on the local diamond several times this season with Denver clubs Mann and Dobbs will do the work may be expected of them Dobbs is a promising young colored player and is a quick and accurate thrower to mates besides being a hard hitter The game will be called at 3 o'clock with Felix O Neil of Denver as umpire The positions of the two clubs will be as follows

Justice of the Peace Sheldon yesterday held Ben Roberts of Monument in $1,000 bail to keep the peace and bound him over to the district court to answer to the charge of assault with intent to kill. Roberts has been separated from his wife for about six months and has followed her about from place to place threatening to kill her. She managed to elude him for some time but he found that she was working at a restaurant in this city On Wednesday night he assaulted her in the place where she was working and said that he would kill her. But for the intervention of outside parties he might have carried out his purpose On finishing the requisite bail Roberts was released from custody.

The factional feeling between the papers in Arapahoe county ought to be stopped, now the nominations are made. It cannot be said that one is any worse than the other.

The Hon. C. C. Davis, of Leadville, introduced a resolution concerning the fact that the state has over one million of dollars deposited in the banks, which draws no interest, also the fact that it is paying interest on indebtedness which must sooner or later be taken up; and believing that this money not drawing interest should be applied to the payment of the debt of the state now paying interest. No argument is required to show the wisdom of this policy.

The platform of the state convention is a strong document. Its position on the [illegible] question should satisfy all those who desire reasonable railroad legislation, and at the same time will not frighten capitalists. The plank on trusts will satisfy all the [illegible] who are a little but confused by Mr. Blaine's rather wild statement. The third plank, relative to [illegible] of American labor, is in the right direction and is a much more sensible utterance than that in the national platform. It is not aimed at the Chinese alone, but at all foreign contract labor. The only thing is to go a step further and forbid the entrance of the vicious classes into our ports.

Undoubtedly the hostile attitude of state legislatures toward railroads has affected the investment value of some railroad stock. In the attempt to redress some of these grievances, the legislatures have gone too far and have worked an injury in the other direction. But it does seem rather audacious in Jay Gould to say the following: "Had the tendency of legislation not been checked by the [illegible] railroad securities and bonds would have been in a fair way to lose their investment value." All the railroad legislation of the country has not begun to injure confidence in railroad stocks near as much as did Gould. Mr. Gould made his boast some years ago that so long as the people liked lithographs, he should keep the printing press running. If the county had checked Mr. Gould and sent him to state prison for stocking, they would have done national deal more to give stocks investment value.

Again, Lee's report in regard to the health office, of Denver, practically admits all that has been alleged against that department. It was notorious that some of the inspectors loafed about saloons during most of their time. His order now says that if they loaf around saloons during the day-time, they shall be discharged. It is evident on its face that something is wrong or no such order would be needed. Some things go without saying. It is not necessary to issue a general order that policemen shall not get drunk while on duty because it goes without saying that they are not to [illegible] position, if they do. It is also quite necessary to issue a general order forbidding inspectors of the health department from loafing about saloons. It would be better to discharge the inspector than to issue the order. Mayor Lee also finds that one of the garbage carts was not used during a part of the day, which is another indictment against the supervision for the care [illegible] way in which they have been doing their work. Another order of his speaks of the great amount of sickness among the police men. It is unfortunate that the committee of the board of health [illegible] to investigate this is to bring on the healthfulness of the city of Denver. It is quite evident now that the Republican did a very good thing in the agitation of the unhealthfulness of Denver. With the white wash [illegible] committee appointed by Mayor Lee seemed to have been for a while effective. Mayor Lee's own action since has confirmed the report and amply vindicated the Republican.

ADVICE TO YOUNG WIVES.

How Boucicault Gives Them Some Valuable Home Truths.

I am regarded as an epicure. If by that term is expressed a particular devotion to the pleasures of the table and to a variety of its delicacies, nothing is further from the truth. As I look on contempt the burlesque shows horse play farces, variety entertainments and other sweet stuffs that have spoiled our digestion in the theatre as the various dishes suffered in the programmes of the great restaurateurs of Paris seem to me beneath the notice, as they are below the dignity, of a thoroughbred stomach. But if the epicure means a fastidious perception of right and wrong in the dressing of food and a keen perverting justice of taste, then I am guilty of the virtue imputed. For it offends me to see food set on a table dressed with a wreath of incongruous dishes reminding one of a vulgarly dressed woman who has piled up her head and figure expansive and showy gowns in a muddle, where one color is quarrelling with its neighbor. To dress in perfect taste means to select appropriate colors and stuffs and to shape them with skill gracefully. So it is with food. One dish does not go with another and there is a symmetry in a breakfast or a dinner which a refined taste can appreciate at once.

Your true epicure abjures all the kickshaws of the kitchen. An appetite is a finite thing, it will only accommodate so much. The economy of taste consists that it be fitted with the best. The art of cookery is not to disguise the natural flavor of food, but to increase and display it. If a rich and sargy sauce accompanies a cutlet we eat the meat for the sake of the sauce. Go on at that rate and we will make off with the sauce. Do not tell me that there is no reason or reflection in the stomach. So rule or law in the mouth. Let us try the case. Invite half a dozen friends to a dinner at seven, and let them sit down to a breakfast. However good and delicate the breakfast may be it will disappoint their appetites—they were hungry for a dinner, and a breakfast does not fill the bill. We have got a more respectable, well informed, thoroughbred member than the same stomach. It is the queen of the body as the brain is king.

My dear and gentle friends, you young wife, have you ever bethought you out of what very small seeds domestic happiness is grown?

AN EVERY DAY SCENE.

Let us draw a scene. A young husband returns to his cozy suburban home weary with work, worried with anxiety of which he says nothing—he does not bring that home—but he arrives hungry and dusty. He finds his wife dainty and cool, reclining in the shade of the verandas. It lacks three hours to dinner time, and in his eagerness to reach his home he has neglected to get any food. He is rather faint. The lady is quite distracted. How foolish of her! She turns her head over her shoulder and calls to Nora to get something quickly for her master. Nora spreads a napkin on the corner of a table and serves a lunch of tea and the ghastly skeleton of a cold fowl of lamb. The young fellow had resisted the invitation of two friends who were going down to Asbestos not much at the club, and now he compares the cold and [illegible] fare set before him with the bright faces and delicate food he had relinquished. I can hear the young wives call this picture unjust and unreasonable. They will say a cottage in the [illegible] We cannot be expected to meet such emergencies. I know a nice little woman that met them and I will tell you how she did it. I remember it well for I sat beside her in the porch of her cottage when we heard the distant whistle of the locomotive announcing the stoppage of the train at the adjacent station. She was on her feet in a moment, for her Jack was coming home. I followed her into the kitchen. Two thick slices of bacon were quickly and snugly placed on the bottom of a small saucepan. I was set to chop an onion up fine. When the bacon was hissing its notice she put over it two lumps of lard and sprinkled them [illegible] of a small lead pencil while I gather some herbs, and you, Jenny, break four eggs into a bowl." In two minutes she was back again with a handful of chervil onion grass (which the French call ciboulette) parsley, and was busily engaged in chopping up the herbs while she folded the parsley in a corner of a towel, pounded it [illegible] The towel absorbed the juice better [illegible] from the crushed fibre of the herbs. These were quickly cut up and all the herbs mixed with the eggs. Meanwhile Jenny had put some of the lard as big as your thumb into a small water pan together with the bacon. In a few minutes the bacon was crisped and while the whole was stewing briskly the eggs were whipped up and poured on. A teaspoonful of black pepper was added and a piece of salt butter as large as a pigeon's egg was stirred in. Now keep that stirring and [illegible] the eggs were [illegible] in the [illegible] a wee shower [illegible] snapped off her apron [illegible] of her short white [illegible] folded up and [illegible] and rosy from the [illegible] to meet her mate. We heard her [illegible] ing hen into the room where [illegible] was all prepared and when he entered after five minutes fracas I up with a good wash we had the table laid [illegible] and whole. When putting on a rich red gravy inundated his plate. Jenny took of her own head done a dish of Sunday [illegible] chip potatoes. Lightly sprinkled with [illegible] and [illegible] and [illegible] select all there was a plate of scrambled eggs together with a basket of cress that had been kept cooling in the ice box. Jack sat down to smiling, and as he looked up into the eager face of his wife he could think that he regarded her little sweet domestic effort to please and set store thereon as a trivial thing. He said nothing but he [illegible] to let affect up her there and kissed her. That was the grace he said. It came up right from his heart where the angel of home by which quietly.

It is by a thousand silken threads like these that the woman enchains a man's life and makes it hers. And as Jack sat on the porch with a cigar which she lighted for him, and his hand in her lap between hers I do not presume he was thinking of any club or the fellows he left there at lunch unless to regret. It was to pity them. Let the scene takes four minutes to walk from the station six more to wash and brush off the dust. What—ten minutes during which time my little friend had played this culinary episode in which I was proud to take the part of a super. Were ten minutes ever better employed? Why should not every girl learn the simple methods by which we prepare half a dozen dishes. It so often comes to happily. Those taper fingers are better [illegible] than [illegible]

Now let us ramble a while over the simple and essential dishes where no skill is required in the cooking but only a strict observance of the rules. Chief and above all in the short list is that staff of life—the Pot au feu. It is unknown in this country, and very little known in England. Yet there is not a cottage, however humble, where it may not be made in perfection. Will your house a dinner for an epicure? Here it is. Pot au feu, omelette with cheese and au gin, a devilled chicken, salad, two [illegible] and a cup of coffee.

To make the pot au feu proceed as follows: Take four pounds of the leg of beef—not the leg your cook who selects your meat takes home and gnaws, which makes glue—to-ah but better—and one pound of veal out the knuckle for same reason. Prepare four large onions, four leeks, four carrots four turnips and, if you can get it, one parsnip, cut the onions in half and three carrots lengthwise and take also the heart of a cabbage or whole lettuce and a bunch of fresh-gathered herbs excluding mint). Put the meat into a large two gallon or three gallon soup-pot or saucepan, cover it well with cold water and set it over a brisk fire, taking the greatest care not to put the lid on the pot. If you inclose the soup the steam will drive the scum into the soup and it will be turbid. Your "professed" cooks will tell you they know how to clear it! Yes! they know how to repair a blunder, and in clearing it with their nostrums they clear away the best juices of the soup. It is vital therefore, that at no [illegible] it must not be allowed over the pot. When the meat boils it will throw up a thick brown scum. Remove it from the fire, and when it ceases to boil, skim it carefully. Restore it to the fire, and on its second boil a gray scum will rise, remove from the fire and skim again. Return it to the fire for the third time, when a white scum will rise. Skim that off in like manner and then the soup will appear as clear as wine. Now replace the pot on the fire, and when it comes to the fourth boil tumble in your vegetables and add a tablespoonful of whole black pepper and the same of salt, remove the pot to the side of the fire, for the vegetables must seethe in the soup but never boil. Leave it there for four or five hours, but as a rule when the carrots and turnips are quite done the soup is ready. Now it has a [illegible] of the coloring essence which gives it the rich golden color we are used to. The French cook ties up the meat with string, so that it will serve as a dish around which the vegetables are disposed. If you have a garden and can use vegetables fresh [illegible] they impart a tone to this dish that is indescribable. If your servant neglects to keep the lid off the pot—discharge her without a character. In serving this dish, remove first the meat from the pot and then with a large dipper fill the tureen with the soup, together with enough of the vegetables, but not too much. If you desire something extra you may add [illegible] of an old rooster will do to the pot. But this dish only when you entertain royally.

Since I have mentioned devilled chicken, let me save you my private prescription. Follow it conscientiously and as the preacher says, "You shall bring me [illegible] Broiling. Put [illegible] third of a pound of butter and a heaped tablespoonful of mustard in powder, knead the two together with a spoon, take a tablespoonful of salt, same of black [illegible] pepper. Dust the chicken well with this mixture. Then lay on the buttered mustard as thick as you can, having slit the legs and breast of the chicken to let in the plaster. Don't be afraid of this quantity of condiments. It will [illegible] Place the chicken on the gridiron over a clear fire. The butter [illegible] and the [illegible] will soon set up a blaze the bird will catch fire for it. It must cook in its own blaze. And thus surrounded with fire it is done in an incredibly short time. Take a teaspoonful of Worcestershire sauce and let it trickle slowly all over the bird while it is still on the fire.

A GOOD DISH.

Now, girls and young wives, you can try your husbands and sweethearts with this dish. Don't think it beneath your accomplishments. You can get the better of some fastidious stomach through their vanity, or [illegible] by some [illegible] for nature placed the stomach very near to the heart she had her reason for it. [illegible]
